

Wild fish need wild forests.

It's no surprise our best salmon and steelhead runs thrive in rivers which flow through wild places. Within the pristine backcountry of America's national forests there are still clear running streams where wild fish flourish. But these wild, scenic gems are threatened by the Bush administration's plan to repeal the Roadless Area Conservation Rule, opening our last wild forests to destructive activities such as road building, logging, and mining.

Take a stand for wild fish and wild forests. Tell the Forest Service to protect America's remaining roadless areas. More than half of our national forests have already been impacted by commercial development. It's time to strike a balance by protecting what remains - before it's too late. Tell them that wild fish need wild forests.

Because once they're gone, they're gone forever!
